The American West of the Literary Imagination

This course will examine the ways in which the American West has been imagined and captured in narrative form over the last couple of centuries. Richard Slotkin's theorizing of cultural myths, David Nye's outlining of "second-creation stories," and Fredrick Jackson Turner's historical treatise, together with samples of recent scholarship on region and genre, will provide a historical and critical perspective for our reading of the selected literary texts. Cooper's The Prairie depicts pioneers and early settlers venturing into the areas of the "Old West," opened up for settlement by the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. Wister's novel from 1902 is considered to lay the foundation for the popular genre of the Western. Crane's short story and Cather's novel from about the same time, set in a small town and in a pastoral landscape respectively, present alternative visions of the West of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century. While Smiley's novel brings us closer to the present time by offering an updated version of the agrarian landscape, Proulx's short stories, one set in the past and the other in our own time, focus on pioneers pitted against the forces of nature and on individuals facing social stigmatization.
